It is important also to consider the possibility that the observed relationship between the two variables is spurious. For example, the relationship may reflect a common cause, such as the fact that the more people who are employed, the more people are likely to be employed in the service sector. In this case, the relationship between the two variables would be spurious, and the observed relationship would be due to the fact that the more people are employed, the more people are likely to be employed in the service sector.

The 1990-1991 season was the worst in the 100-year record for the amount of rainfall the city received. Precipitation for the 1990-1991 season was 100.7 inches, compared to the 70.5 inches for the 1989-1990 season. But the good part of the 1990-1991 season came early in the season, beginning in June, leaving little rain in September and October. Storms and heavy January rain kept the city's reservoir capacity through most of the 1990-1991 season, but the water in the reservoir was not enough to meet the city's needs.

Figure 2. Figure 2 illustrates the relationship between the number of days of rain and the number of days of rain. The x-axis represents the number of days of rain, and the y-axis represents the number of days of rain. The data points are plotted as open circles, and a linear regression line is shown. The equation of the line is $y = 0.5x + 1.5$, and the coefficient of determination is $R^2 = 0.95$.
